Contents

List of figures vii
List of tables xix
Notes on contributors xxii
Preface xxxv

Introduction

LISA PEÑALOZA, NIL TOULOUSE, AND LUCA M. VISCONTI
Scope and organization of the book 5
References 11

PART I
Global–local cultural domains 13

1 Cultures, consumers, and corporations RUSSELL BELK

Overview 15
Food for thought 16
Food, pleasure, and pain 20
Conclusion: cultures of food 23
Review and discussion questions 25
Keywords 25
References 25

2 International marketing at the interface of the alluring global and the comforting local

GÜLİZ GER, OLGA KRAVETS, AND ÖZLEM SANDIKÇI

Overview 30
Cultural positioning: overcoming the dualities of standardization/adaptation and global/local 30
The allure of the global and the comfort of the local 33
Mangling the foreign and the familiar: two cases 35
Managerial implications 40
3 Mediterranean shoes conquer the world

Global branding from local resources: the Camper case

Daniele Dalli and Simona Romani

Overview

Brand management literature is often based on the implicit assumption that there are general rules and common principles for globally building and exploiting a brand's potential. According to this view, brand meanings and values can be "adapted" to the international setting according to the target markets' characteristics. Moreover, adaptation usually presupposes domestic (country of origin) and international markets' intrinsic characteristics.

In this section, we describe the Camper case: this company succeeded in positioning the brand according to its local meanings and values, influencing the market to accept them, thus contradicting the "adaptation" paradigm (local think global, act local) and following the opposite way around. Furthermore, this experience demonstrates that management rules, especially when they involve cultural interaction, can be critically assessed and "transformed". Subsequently, original, innovative, and successful strategies can be developed by interpreting the brand's role in its cultural background and in the target market.

Introduction

This chapter aims to demonstrate that, following a cultural orientation in brand management, effective international marketing strategies can be based on local values and meanings that can be successfully extended towards the global market. This is the situation at Camper, originally a small company on the island of Majorca, Spain – geographically and culturally a small area compared with the large economies of North America, continental Europe and Japan. The company has successfully exported its products using the brand as an ideological and cultural carrier (Holt 2004; Schroeder et al. 2006) representing ethnic and ethical issues, even critical ones. An example of the latter is the company’s famous “walk don’t run” slogan that seems targeted at global footwear brands that encourage jogging. Hence, a cultural orientation in marketing can be promising for many small and medium-sized companies, not necessarily located in wealthy economies, but still aiming at competing on a global scale, "out-localizing" transnational corporations (Ger 1999).

Traditional strategic brand management often follows the implicit assumption of branding as a universal technique and the use of common principles across cultures to build a strong brand. It ignores the crucial aspect of brand as a cultural form; in practice, the traditional approach to brands and branding assumes that the cultural context has a marginal role in determining the brand architecture and the model of the brand development.
Kapferer (2008), for example, minimizes the importance of the brands’ historical, geographical and cultural roots in the creation of a strong global brand identity and positioning. He affirms that the geographical roots (Premuna vodka and Finland) or the native soil’s values (Apple and California) can help the process of brand building, but denies many other elements to be more important in this process, such as a brand’s typical products, symbols, logos, etc.

From another point of view, Keller (2008) focuses on brand value creation (building). According to this perspective, companies create value starting from zero and/or exploiting extant cultural and symbolic resources. In this process, nothing is said about the ideological dimension of the market process: brands and branding are not neutral cultural tools and their development often implies ideological, if not even ethical, decisions. Branding strategies and their extension to international markets can be seen as acts of reproduction of the dominant ideological values (Arnould and Thompson 2005). In fact, often consumers react negatively to corporate communication and try to resist (Holt 2002). Companies are not necessarily constrained to carry on and reproduce extant market ideology: they can also challenge mainstream values and differentiate their positioning in ideological and ethical terms. This means paying attention to the target consumers’ cultural characteristics in a more profound, critical, and interactive way than the usual “adaptation” paradigm (Cayla and Arnould 2008).

In this section, unlike in the above-mentioned approaches, we accept the idea of a brand as a specific symbolic form, a particular way of talking about and regarding the world. Consequently, it is essential to examine branding from deep historical, geographical and socio-cultural contexts in order to acknowledge the diverse way of branding and thinking about brands across different situations. If branding is viewed as a culturally malleable mode of communication, this allows us to think more productively about the way the cultural context influences branding activities – even its ideological dimension.

The interpretive tradition in consumer research has shown how important the knowledge of local culture can be in order to compete successfully against global players (Gut 1999). The intrinsic advantage of local companies is their “local identity and culture”. This can be improved to compete with “local” strategies aimed at defining goods and services “authentic” value. Traditional international marketing approaches focus brand management’s attention on the search for similarities at the global level to turn them into local, adapted marketing programs, whereas in a more culturally oriented fashion, local companies could and should focus on local idiosyncrasies and extend them on a global scale (Askegaard and Kjeldgaard 2007).

As the case of Camper will demonstrate, companies can also consider the socio-cultural setting in critical ways, proposing new and unexpected cultural and marketing programs, in which “local” resources are employed to change the “global” cultural and competitive scenario.

Consider the Camper case in a specific segment of the footwear market:

- Camper “criticized” the market’s dominant logic: Walk, don’t run!
- Camper chose concerned and committed consumers: no los compras, si no los necesitas! (Don’t buy the product, if you don’t need it!)
- Camper has changed (self-criticism) its positioning and communication by trying to select and link groups of consumers with similar cultural and ideological orientations toward the same core concept: the Med (the Mediterranean) is the Net.

In this section we analyze the emergence of Camper’s footwear as a successful international brand to contribute to this research stream. In particular, we discuss the ways in which historical, cultural, social and geographical configurations could influence brand activities and become precious resources that the company can use to define diverse and particular identities and positioning.

In 2000, with a view to competing against well-founded global fashion brands in the global market, Camper launched its campaign, “The Walking Society”. By building on its established origins and on the David and Goliath story (with its compelling binaries), Camper was portrayed as “small”, “friendly”, “authentic” and rooted in a traditional “Mediterranean spirit”. This unique positioning stood in clear contrast to the “cool” and “placeless” global fashion brands and produced results in terms of sales and revenues.

To explain Camper’s success, we need to explore the complex relations between different forms of brand building strategies, myths and authenticity.

The company and its history

To understand the Camper phenomenon, we must start with its origins. The company’s history began in 1877 when Antonio Fluxà, on returning from a trip to England, brought together a group of craftsmen in his birthplace, Majorca,1 and set up the island’s first shoe factory. The manufacturing tradition was handed down from father to son to Antonio Fluxà’s grandson, Lorenzo, who, in 1975, created the Camper brand with the idea of introducing design in the company and producing casual wear products.

In a Spain where the Franco dictatorship had recently ended and which was characterized by a strongly conservative spirit, Camper’s decision to introduce casual shoes was no coincidence. The project emerged as a yearning for liberty and change – a yearning which marked the post-Franco period in Spain, an example of the desire for a radical transformation after years of isolation and the country’s closed attitude towards the rest of the world.

Camper had anticipated the explosion of creativity that would characterize the country a few years later, particularly in the city of Barcelona, with which Camper has always had close and strong relations. It was precisely here that the first mono-brand shop was opened in 1981, and here that 23 years later, Camper initiated its business diversification in the catering (with Camper FoodHall) and hospitality (with Casa Camper) sectors. In 1992, the international expansion of the brand began with the opening of branches (offices and shops) in the main centres of European fashion (the UK, France, and Italy).

However, the crucial turning point for Camper came after a meeting with the young copywriter Shubhankar Ray2 who discovered the brand in 2000 during a trip to Majorca.

I thought it had the potential of Apple. There is something friendly about it; I thought it was slightly idiosyncratic and had more to do with industrial design than fashion. Also, they weren’t based in London or New York, but Majorca. I thought the location had a psychological-geographical impact on the brand. But the image was not really an international standard.

(Interview recorded by the authors at the Camper headquarters in Majorca in July 2006. This holds for other excerpts, unless otherwise stated.)

Ray managed to meet with Lorenzo Fluxà, who immediately decided to employ him to develop Camper’s image:
I asked to be put up in an old finca on the hill to achieve the same psycho-geographical effect. I started to look at what this culture comprised. They are not confident with outsiders; there are fences everywhere. They are insular, Spartan. There is a reluctance to waste money. I started photographing the countryside, the farmer playing a card game called “truco”, people on Vespa, horse-trap racing in which the horses aren’t allowed to run. I started to define another Majorca, one that wasn’t about tourists getting drunk on the beach.1

The result of this experience was the identification of something “unique” about both the brand and the island. It was something that had always been there, but that had never been defined. Ray decided to use this exclusivity, together with other elements, to conceive the Camper brand that, right from the start, he considered as something very distant from traditional, US-based models of globalization and consumerism.

In contemporary social and cultural conditions, brands can have several potential meanings and can be used and interpreted in unexpected ways in local contexts, where they are re-territorialized, appropriated and transformed in surprising ways. For example, Cova et al. (2007) highlight many variations in the meanings that American and French players give to a battle re-enactment game called Warhammer. Again, Kates and Göh (2003), using the Absolute Vodka brand case, illustrate that brand meanings “morp” across social, community and national groups, facilitated by marketers who understand plurality and cultural diversity. However, while certain global brands might be characteristically fluid, others are more culturally and affectively fixed. Crucially, Holt (2006) recognizes that brands cannot generate meanings to which people will subscribe regardless. Such brands should rather tap into broader sensations, desires, opinions and identities, often aligning themselves with mythical notions produced by different cultural forms such as movies, novels, music, popular discourse, etc. Brands may thus be conceived as “ideological parasites” that depend on tapping into pre-existing discourses and feelings, into “myth markets” (ibid.).

Here we can identify a popular myth associated with the Camper case that taps into popular pre-existing structures of feeling, belief and identity and through which individuals acquire meaning for their social lives and experiences. It is, in fact, by building on its established origins and the David and Goliath story – dynamized by the compelling mini-giant, local/global and south/north binaries – that the Camper brand emerges as a “small”, “friendly”, “authentic” and rooted in a traditional “Mediterranean spirit”. This is very distant from the prefabricated glossy images that advertisers traditionally associate with global fashion brands.

The story of David and Goliath is one of a small, weak party taking on a giant. In most contexts, smallness and weakness are not advantages as such. Goliath killed many other Israelites who were smaller and weaker. David’s sling and five stones taken from a brook were simple technology, especially when employed against the armour that made Goliath seem invulnerable. However, David’s one stone hit him on the forehead and the giant fell face down.

Similarly, Ray identified in the normally devalued local (in comparison to the global) possible strengths. These strengths could be grasped when combined, in new dynamic ways, with the island’s precious historical, geographical and cultural resources. Together with the family’s know-how of the product, the austerity and simplicity of the rural world, as well as the Mediterranean history and culture, all of these influence the brand’s aesthetics and values. These phenomena represent several forms of brand rooting that the company uses to successfully create a distinctive and authentic image.

Rooting Camper in the rural Mediterranean world

Rurality and old traditions

Camper means peasant, and the simplicity of the rural world is one of the brand’s most important roots. My previous work at Levi’s and Caterpillar had all been about globalization and the urban; I began to conceive Camper as the opposite: local and rural. I was thinking about an alternative and opposite viewpoint to construct its brand image. I was lucky that the brand owner wanted to create something different and indulged me in my particular line of thinking, which was based more on ‘mindstyle’ than on lifestyle.

As Ray passionately and rigorously stresses, given its geographical origin (Majorca), the Camper brand had the possibility of being rooted in an honest and simple rural spirit. This is an alternative way of thinking – the opposite of the great themes of modernization and development.

Pasini (2005) observes that the geography of this brand forms part of its DNA, to the point that, from time to time, one has the impression that Camper’s rural roots are as important as the product itself. This particular brand would not have been possible, or would have been quite different, had it not been conceived in Majorca.

The present cultural context – having left the phase of triumphant modernity behind and now witnessing the affirmation of postmodern thought – clearly favours this type of very traditional “rooting. Owing to postmodernism’s rediscovery of aesthetic and emotive aspects, its sense of openness toward others and those who are different, and the end of the great narratives, it can accommodate the rise of new approaches in branding and marketing in general.

As several authors note (Firat and Dholakia 2006), postmodernism, precisely because it succeeds modernism, does not demonize tradition as a simple and obtuse resistance to modernity. It rather considers tradition as a resource, a store of symbols and meanings that can be reinterpreted in a new phase and on the basis of new requirements. Some groups of consumers actually perceive the need to distance themselves from the fundamentalism of modernity. They therefore transfer new values from rural traditions (honesty, austerity, simplicity) in order to regain the quality of life. These values can provide different concepts of wealth than the dominant ones, which are limited to a mere private accumulation of goods as a possible solution to present-day needs.

Camper crucially emphasizes respect for tradition and its rural origins, reinterpreting these on the basis of present needs, and giving them a new meaning in the light of changes brought about by progress and innovation.

Camper crucially emphasizes respect for tradition and its rural origins, reinterpreting these on the basis of present needs, and giving them a new meaning in the light of changes brought about by progress and innovation.

The spirit of the brand is transmitted through the product. Our shoes are a link between our origin and tradition and our markets’ urban reality. They evoke the stable values of the rural Mediterranean world – durability and simplicity – and incorporate them into the urban world by means of a sophisticated informality, a careful design, a rhetoric that does not discard irony and, particularly, imagination.

(Camper internal document)

We are thus faced with a postmodern, not a pre-modern interpretation of traditions. Rural values such as sobriety and respect for nature and the environment have endured the modernity that had reduced and confined them. However, by bearing the experience of this period and having acquired certain elements from it, those values are now transformed in respect of their origin. This signifies a reworking of traditions on the basis of their continuous interaction with modernity.

Hence, the pre-modern interpretation of austerity (reduce, re-use, repair) is re-taken from a contemporary viewpoint with recourse to new production processes that favour material and energy savings, to recycled and recyclable materials, to simple, basic and modest products. In addition, respect for nature and the environment is reconsidered through the use of ecological and natural materials. It is not by chance that Lorenza Fluxà, the actual owner, considers Camaleon (Figure 3.1), the first shoe model produced by Camper in 1976, to be the real symbol of the company. The reason is because this shoe was inspired by an authentic peasant model made in an artisan way with pieces of truck canvas, leather offsets and rubber tire. Camaleon was the “original recycled” shoe.

As reported by Pasini (2005):

Working toward health and sustainability, today, means adding value to a project, starting with a design that leans toward the essential that backs the idea of eliminating components and simplifying products rather than adding new and redundant elements. The experience of comfort is a simple idea that can be given concrete representation through materials and the production process if one is capable of applying a new concept of technology, in which the vision of a long-term future is sustained by the need to reduce and simplify rather than add elements. Reducing is the great hope of the future since reducing means diminishing our dependency on products and raw materials, which are clearly less and less compatible with the idea of sustainable development.

(Interview with Juana Martorell, Camper Product Manager at that time)

The Camper product that perhaps best represents this philosophy is the “Wabi” (Figure 3.2). This shoe’s name is a Japanese word from the verb “Wabiru” (to ask for forgiveness). The shoe was developed according to the concepts of simplicity, modest living, comfort and pure satisfaction. Ergonomic and environmentally friendly, the shoe was launched on the market with the slogan “healthy for your feet, good for the planet” and “healthy + clean = Wabi”. The main trait of this model is that whereas the majority of shoes need an average of 10 production phases and 60 components, the Wabi merely requires four phases and three independent components (external protection, inner sole and sock) using natural, recyclable materials such as rubber, jute, felted wool or coconut fibre.

Figure 3.1 Camaleon shoes.

Figure 3.2 Wabi shoes.

The rural root of this brand is also re-created in advertising. Showing super-real, contradictory images of a simple and traditional Mediterranean reality is an alternative to the American models of globalization and consumption in which everybody is sexy and cool. Some examples from the campaigns include old men playing a local bowling game, small cars photographed in Naples, camels, Bedouins, and a contemporary Cleopatra in Cairo.

The Mediterranean history and culture

Another central element in the rooting of the Camper brand is the Mediterranean history and culture. Ray maintains that it is necessary to re-appraise the Mediterranean, its dignity and identity and, accordingly, the need to disrupt the modern Northern dominance. In particular, Ray’s ideas are based on the desire to get rid of the cliches and stereotypes that have been attributed to the Mediterranean area by dominant thinking and that associates it with either the mafia, and other criminal activities, or with images of an idyllic tourist paradise. He strongly perceives the need to go beyond these perceptions and to focus on those values that constitute Mediterranean wealth, such as creativity, openness to others, fantasy, imagination and tolerance. These are the positive and valuable characteristics that should contribute to the brand-building process and form Camper’s identity all over the world.

Ray’s point of view on the role of the Mediterranean area is very aligned to that claimed in several books by Franco Cassano (1996, 1998, 2001, 2002), the Italian sociologist who takes on the challenge of trying to come up with a true discourse capable of illustrating Mediterranean thinking and culture. As he clearly affirms in Penisola (Peninsula) (1998: 90):

Today, it is possible to rediscover the South, the Mediterranean, to restore the value of its innate polytheism, the relish of a moderation that arises from this ancient destination at the crossroads of nations. This is the only right thing to do here and not only here.

Mediterranean values are therefore not only a cultural proposal for the South, but a resource for contemporary thinking in general. These values can be of central importance in the South’s integration into a global culture to which it can contribute creatively. This differs radically from its long-assigned role as a depressed area and obstacle to development. This means reformulating “alternative conventions of poverty and wealth, taking into account the dignity of another way of living” (Cassano 1996: 5). It means re-examining these points by challenging the myths generated by modernity. For example:
The desert was not destined for the motorized idocy of the Paris–Dakar. It has been a founding location of a part of spirituality, divine transits, marches, fasts, temptations and fears. It was much richer when crossed by these travellers than today when it has become the state of consummertist followers of the foreign legion. Only a clouded mind could consider the desert as something awaiting progress, to fill, to develop for tourism and normalisation.

(2001: 154)

One of the Mediterranean values given most attention is that of slowness. Cassano entitles the first chapter in Pensiero meridiano (Meridian Thinking) “go slowly” and certain texts contained in Modernizzare stanza (Modernizing makes you tired) are veritable eulogies to slowness. He observes that:

[T]he man of speed, homo currus, undoubtedly gains certain faculties, but loses others, primarily attention for others …, the passion, caring or tenderness that comes from having not merely aims, but also sentiments, not only competitors, but also friends, ties, prohibitions or troubles.

Regaining slowness can favour the contemporaneous presence of different temporalities (fast and slow) and therefore enable the individual to choose from these various contexts. As Ficut (2005) observes, if only a small elite of trendsetters were to be inclined towards slowness, the majority of people would find pleasure in immersing themselves in different ways of living and consuming without limiting their choice to just one.

The defence of slowness is central for Camper with its motto “Walk, don’t run” and “The Walking Society” advertising campaign that Ray created in 2001. Camper intends to restore the pleasure of walking to another speed which is one of modernity’s greatest, obsolescing. Indeed, Camper’s communication advises individuals to re-appropriate slower rhythms, rediscover reflection, calmness, pauses, a sense of sociality and contact with nature.

For Camper, walking also means travelling, going from one place to another. In fact, “The Walking Society” campaign takes the consumer to a different Mediterranean country each season. This is meant to refer to (and reinforce) the cultural Zeitgeist underpinning the Camper brand.

Each campaign is rooted in a specific location (Majorca, Morocco, Italy, Greece, Egypt, etc.), with certain people and their customs, and seeks to illustrate some of the values found in the David and Goliath story that strongly influence the brand-building process.

All in all, The Walking Society represents a virtual society of people who share the Mediterranean spirit, but come from different social, cultural, economic, or geographical realities and who dedicate their imagination and their efforts — individually or collectively — to contribute useful, positive ideas and solutions to improve the world.

(Camper internal document)

Moreover, as part of the campaign, Ray initiated a low-budget magalog (magazine + catalogue); this publication features provoking and often controversial photographs, amusing images from Moroccan landscapes, and of Bedouins in Egypt at the time of the American invasion of Iraq. Besides the images, Ray also features politically charged articles on subjects like the oil trade, the anti-car movement, slow food and free software in the magalog. The magalog can thus be seen as Camper communication’s ideological vector.

The result: authenticity with “realism”

Camper attempts to deeply root its brand by using historical, geographical and cultural themes to attain authenticity — the key concept. The rural Mediterranean area becomes the site of claims for authenticity as a marker that distinguishes this area from the non-authentic urban global North.

On Lovemarks, Brenda from the United Arab Emirates writes:

When you’re in an elevator, do you press the button manically in the hope the doors will close quicker? Walk don’t run. When you’re passing by a garden do you put your head down, immersed in your thoughts? Walk don’t run. Do you have to stop and talk to people or do you rush around from one chore to the next? Walk don’t run. Do you take the time to savour the goodness in your food? Walk don’t run. That is the Camper’s spirit — open, authentic and refreshing.

(September 7, 2006, www.lovemarks.com)

Authenticity is a central element in branding (Alexander 2009) because it serves as a form of cultural distinction that can be projected onto objects, places and institutions through which consumers can “express themselves and fix points of security and order in an amorphous modern society” (Spoonar 1986: 226). Consumers look for brands that contribute to the creation of their identity by providing important symbolic and cultural elements (Arundel and Thompson 2005). Successful brands are those that best realize this project, that succeed in creating worlds that stimulate, provoke and inspire the consumer’s imagination, that help him/her interpret the surrounding culture and find an acceptable position within it (Holt 2004; Beverland and Farrelly 2010).

However, this is not always enough to ensure long-lasting success, since in a situation of equality in terms of cultural contribution, consumers prefer the brands of companies that demonstrate their ability to fulfill their civic obligations, “that act like a local merchant, as a stalwart citizen of the community” (Holt 2002: 88). Camper has made a real contribution to this process of constructing a new form of authenticity that places increasing importance on the ethical and cultural qualities of the company that markets the brand, and which has to transform this brand into a veritable cultural resource that can inspire and stimulate consumers.

As illustrated above, by emphasizing the Mediterranean’s re-evaluation and the recovery of tradition with modernity and also taking into consumers or citizens’ increasing request for respect into consideration, Camper represents a true authentic brand — a “citizen artist brand” according to Holt’s (2002) definition.

As Laura writes on Lovemark: “I love Camper because they love nature, while being innovative. Because they radiate happiness. Because they are fashionable, but they are out of the fashion system. Because I like what they believe in” (September 14, 2005, www.lovemarks.com).

Not all brands are made by “money-grabbing capitalists” selling products that consumers probably don’t need. Some brands can project an honest reality with social responsibility and ethics. Camper is one of them.
However, this is not the end of the story. Since Camper faces more competition, Ray’s task, in 2005, became to transform the rural Mediterranean positioning by including cities from the emerging world, to do so with humour and to extend the company image across the globe.

Transforming the rural Med positioning to include more international images

In Camper’s language, walking is a metaphor for travel. In 2005, a new exciting journey in search of new cultural experiences and new possible relationships started for this brand. The first destination was India with the Autumn/Winter 2005 campaign, which was immediately followed by China. Ray explains this decision:

> After the 2000–2004 period when the focus was on the Mediterranean and on the opposition between north and south, I had the feeling that there was a way to propose the same strategy, the same concept to a bigger world outside the Mediterranean. I considered the possibility of playing with the same idea, playing with the same things (slowness, walking, etc.) but inside a new setting, a new world.

> And I realized that there were relationships between the South (Spain, Italy, the Arabic countries and the East) that were far more than between the West and the South.

The East is synonymous with civilization, ease and comfort; it is the place of the community, of the hierarchy; it is the place where rules (natural, social, etc.) come before individuals whose freedom mainly lies in the interpretation of their roles in society (Cassano 1998: 50–1).

But the interesting point in this transformation from the rural Mediterranean to a more international positioning is the creation of a new type of opposition, based not only on the North–South binary this time, but also on alliances: on one side, the strong North-West characterized by innovation, technologies, and economics and, on the other side, the weak South-East with its backwardness, fatalism, and deficit. Again, David versus Goliath story emerges, although in an extended version.

Ray talks about “creative pollination” outside the Med and he tries to generate new cultural experiences associated with the brand, choosing the different cultures’ essential and truly authentic elements and combining them in an original way. The images of holy cows in India, of farmers and rice paddies in China are a way to reinforce Camper brand values – such as rurality, slowness, irony, naturality – and to enrich them with diversity (Figure 3.3).

The result of this activity is a new type of creative language open to experimentation and contamination, in which the experience of difference stops being a defensive barrier and become a stimulus for new contact. According to Ray, Camper “moves from the rural Mediterranean with reality to the international emerging world with diversity”.

This movement to the East is also associated with an important Camper sales growth in the Asian Pacific, especially in Korea and Japan. The brand started to perform really well, much better than in other areas of the world, such as the US. However, the idea of the new South-East alliance was soon replaced by the South in the Autumn/Winter 2006 campaign. In this case, not the Mediterranean South, but the Latin American South as represented by Brazil and the city of São Paulo (Figure 3.4). Ray stresses “the passage from the old world...

São Paulo is a location that emphasizes the brand’s new international status, and the idea of movement from the Mediterranean to the rest of the world. The city’s multicultural mix can specifically help deliver diversity as the new core brand value. The sansha friends, the graffiti artists, the flower growers and the football players are the visual expression of the association between the rural Mediterranean Camper values and the social groups featuring Brazil’s rich diversity of Brazil (Figure 3.5).

The emerging country trilogy closes Camper’s journey around the world. As competition increases and the brand becomes more visible around the world, there is the need to protect the brand’s mindset, values and personality. What next strategy will allow Camper to continue being a “special” brand?

The analysis of the diverse ways of branding and thinking about brands across different contexts is very limited. These issues are strongly related to the idea of a brand as a cultural form, which is generally detached from the traditional strategic brand management approach. Conversely, when a brand is accepted as a specific cultural and symbolic form, as a particular way of talking about and seeing the world (Cayla and Arnould 2008), it is crucial to consider it from deep historical, geographical and socio-cultural contexts. Thus, the diverse ways of branding and thinking about brands across situations can be acknowledged, and the idea that all over the world brands are evolving in the same way, can be rejected.

Conclusion and managerial recommendations

The Camper experience seems promising in the light of a cultural appraisal of marketing models and tools. Without a clever and committed concern for the cultural dimension of the company’s background, actual setting, and final market, Camper would have not been able to compete against global players in the footwear market. In this case, symbolic and mystic elements of local culture have been processed and transferred to a larger setting (the international market), adapting brand image to and positioning in one country at a time, but following the same “ideological” framework: rationality, tradition, authenticity, moderation, etc.

In a sense, the company has employed both flexibility and modesty with regard to the cultural settings at which the brand has been targeted. Modesty means that Camper has not taken the actual market conditions for granted and the company has been willing to take a critical stance toward them, even towards its own values and past experiences. In a period in which “running” seemed a mainstream trend, Camper decided to ask its customers not to run, just walk. When global marketing communication had been focused on product performance, endorsement, and massive campaigns, Camper chose traditional and sustainable product attributes, peasants and farmers as endorsers, and their own customers as communication agents.

This history has been told by means of an open-minded cultural framework: flexible, modest, and – mostly importantly – open. The Med-is-the-Net metaphor stands for a flexible, soft, permeable and inclusive tool that the company used to intelligently “endorse” their customers in different countries, and win their attention and attachment.

In a sense, Camper has turned the “glocal” (think global, act local) slogan into its opposite: “localal” (think local, act global). The company has been able to apply a self-referential, self-critical, even critical assessment to assign the most value to the local symbolic and Cultural resources employed in an international setting (Askegaard and Kjeldgaard 2007; Ger 1999).

The Camper experience can be located in Cova's (2005) idea of a Mediterranean approach to marketing. Using Cassano’s model of Meridional Thinking (Cassano 1998), he proposes a moderate marketing approach capable of avoiding the excesses that characterize the traditional Mediterranean view of marketing. Cova’s moderate position of a company vis-a-vis its consumers generates:

- A more comprehensive and less utilitarian approach that does not involve simplistic reflections phrased in terms of market actions or responses to consumers, but instead calls for a more complex understanding both of how companies fit into society, and also of their interrelations with all of its actors. In other words, this is a socially relevant perspective of the interface between clients, firms and all of their market-oriented or non-market-oriented stakeholders.

(Cova 2005: 211)

Camper fits very well with this sense of proportion regarding the company’s product offer, marketing approach, and relation with society.

The company took a critical stance toward extant models about how to run the business and engage with customers. Starting from internal job conditions and relationships with employees, Camper developed a general positioning in terms of ethics and ideology. Employment contracts, services, and even manufacturing options (outsourcing, delocalization, material, etc.) have been considered in the light of a mature and socially responsible attitude. Starting from this, Camper took a humble perspective about how to approach the market and its customers without imposing or projecting a pre-defined model of consumer behaviour to which customer could or should adapt. Besides, Camper offerings have been proposed as an opportunity, a resource, “just in case” it could prove to be interesting and/or attracting: no las compras, no las necesitas! (Don’t buy it, if you don’t need it). Moreover, the company took a pedagogical stance towards its customers and the market, trying to defend and support ideals of sustainability, openness, tolerance, and integration, creating a welcoming bundle of products, services, platforms, and meanings.

However, it is important that applying the associations between ways of thinking and managerial actions is not limited to the Med area, but can be extended to other areas of the world. An interesting case is represented by the Celtic approach to marketing (Brown 2006; McAuley et al. 2006) that stresses the valorization of the typical Celtic traits of being “spontaneous, creative, dangerous, mystical” and the opposition to the more Anglo-Saxon ones of being “methodical, rule-seeking, circumspect, rational” (Hacker 2006: 69). In terms of marketing practices, the focus here is on the use of Celtic symbols, designs, myths, and legends as part of the product, packaging, promotion, etc. The marketing of Guinness, the popular Irish beer, provides an useful successful example: in spite of being brewed in 30 countries and marketed in 150 regions, the brand identity continues to be quintessentially Irish because the Celtic myths and symbols have been central in the development of the brand identity during its long history (Simmons 2006).

Cayla and Eckhardt (2008) present interesting experiences about Asian companies that are trying to Asianize their positioning, situating brands as belonging less to a specific country and more to a region. Again, as in the Camper case, and in general in the construction of iconic American brands, as illustrated by Holt (2004), brand managers draw from different local stories and myths to create powerful brands. This is specifically true with these regional Asian brand managers’ need to create a new synthesis of cultural referents (East and West, future and present, etc.). With these references, they construct a new identity myth for Asian consumers that is more appealing than the traditional representation of the exotic Asia. Similar to the Camper experience, these brands try to combine tradition and modernity, and to construct a different type of modernity that does not imitate the West and that “escape the Western and orientalist gaze representing Asia as exotic” (Cayla and Eckhardt 2008: 226).

Review and discussion questions

The Camper experience suggests the need for a more plural, self-reflexive, culturally conscious, even critical reasoning about the way in which marketing managers approach branding decisions. The following elements can be employed to stimulate collective discussion:

1. Local cultural values are not necessarily marginal, even if, from a merely quantitative point of view, they represent a small portion of the whole market. Camper meanings and values are rooted in a micro-culture that lies at the crossroad between Spanish, Catalan, and Majorcan traditions, all of which share common Mediterranean origins. Regardless of the size of this cultural background, these values can be extended to and re-interpreted for a larger, multi-cultural setting.

2. Local, even marginal, cultural meanings and values prove attractive for various profiles/segments of global consumers. Different markets have appreciated Camper shoes for different reasons – from the design to the company’s communication, from its cultural values to its ethical stances. Local values can be conjugated according to different final market characteristics.

3. The development of local cultural values towards global branding strategies can be improved by employing managerial capabilities and competences that come from outside the cultural milieu: outsiders’ cultural framework helps to identify the most important issues in a local culture that can be better employed in the global branding strategy.

4. Given that brands can be conceived as cultural and ideological carriers, it is necessary to carefully identify and select appropriate symbols and values, starting from local and specific ones, and seeing whether and how they can be “translated” for a wider market.

5. In the Camper case, elements of the communication mix are markedly idiosyncratic compared to traditional marketing approaches: for instance, the endorsers of the brand differ from traditional ones. Which other elements in Camper’s communication can be considered from the same perspective?

6. Camper aimed at building an iconic brand. Usually iconic brands benefit from premium price strategies. Is this true? If so, should it be accepted? Is it possible to conceive iconic brands as convenience brands?

Keywords

authenticity, critical marketing, cultural branding, hybridization, iconic brand, Mediterranean, myth, responsibility, simplicity, sustainability
Notes
1 Majorca is the largest of the Balearic Islands, Spain. It is located in the Mediterranean Sea, approximately 200 km south of Barcelona.
2 Shubhaanak Ray was born in Calcutta, India, in 1968. After graduating from Manchester University with a Chemistry BSc, he worked for numerous global brands: Gi-Star, Camper, Caterpillar, Levi's, Stride, and Travel Fox.
3 McCracken (1988, pp. 11-12) describes the relationship between the researcher and the culture and observes that “the intimate acquaintance with one’s own culture can create as much blindness as insight. It can prevent the observer from seeing cultural assumptions and practices.” Ray, as a stranger to the local culture, was able to minimize the dangers of familiarity. Excerpt from icon.eye. com (http://www.iconeye.com/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=2622:mul-loca---icon-024---june-2005).
4 In 2005, in addition to the brand’s internationalization phase, the company decided on a diversification phase. Camper FoodBall, an ecological and healthy alternative to fast food, and Casa Camper, a new concept hotel, are the results of this diversification. The company realized these projects internally and manages them under the motto “Producing for the three fundamental needs of man: feet, home and food, the rest is a bonus.”

References